PREPAREDNESS TOUR

Two Dodge Cars Representing Bay State Arrive in Town After a Nerve Racking Trip.

Two Dodge cars marked M. V. M. and representing the Massachusetts "preparedness tour," arrived in town early Tuesday morning after a nerve-racking trip from Rutland via the Canadian border. The cars left Rutland at 3.30 a. m., Monday and came up the west side of the state to St. Albans, which they reached at 2 o'clock and where they delivered a letter to Adjutant General Lee S. Tiltonson from the adjutant general of the state of Massachusetts. Their next stop was at Franklin with a letter from Gov. McCall of Massachusetts to Gov. Gates of Vermont. Leaving Enosburg Falls they were warned against taking a particular road on account of the mud. The men assured those who warned them that unless the mud was over the axles it would not trouble them, but took the advice, much to their regret later on. The road gradually became little more than a trail and at last stopped altogether in deep woods.

Darkness was coming on and they wandered across the Canadian line while trying to get back onto the road. Suddenly they struck something buried in the leaves which gripped their left front tire like a vise, the tire exploded and the "something" proved to be a bear trap. After putting on a new tire they started off, again bringing the bear trap along with them as a souvenir of the encounter.

They had left Rutland in good weather but ran into rain and 20 miles this side of Newport, late in the evening, encountered a blinding snow storm. St. Johnsbury was reached at 1 a. m. They were a tired lot, for they did not reach Rutland until midnight Sunday, after riding 32 miles from Greenfield over the Mohawk Trail, and left at 3.30 for their trip through northern Vermont.

Two of the party made the Caledonian a call Tuesday morning before starting off for another long ride through Dixville Notch into northern Maine. The car which carries the men has a history of its own. In less than a year's service it has traveled over 30,000 miles, and this summer has been used by Adjutant General Cole of Massachusetts for all his work in visiting the militia camps and getting his men ready to send to the border.

Before coming here the men had visited the states of Maine, Rhode Island and Connecticut with letters for the governors and chief military officers, and they still have letters to deliver to the executive of New Hampshire.

This "preparedness tour" is an unusual experiment in military preparation in that the motor scouts who are sent out by the governor and adjutant general of Massachusetts are expected to return with detailed and accurate data and maps of roads and routes. They also gather in concrete form information as to the possibilities of hauling troops and supplies in the most expeditious manner from the centers of population in New England to points not easily accessible, but that might be most vital in a military emergency. They hope too, to arouse an interest in the preparedness of New England. The information which they collect is based on the assumption that in the case of a threatened invasion motor cars would be commandeered to augment railroad transportation facilities or to act independently of them. If it should be necessary to commandeer cars it is said that about 80,000 could be taken in New England. They have also stated the principal coast positions offering landing places for possible invading forces are examined and maps made.

The hardest part of the trip is in the border country, and special study will be made of the routes here.

The Dodge cars in which the party travel look weather-beaten, as do the men in them, but they stood every test required of them, and are ready for as many more thousand miles before returning to Massachusetts. So far as is known this is the first official effort made to secure plans which might in grave crisis prove of inestimable value to national defense.

The party consists of Mr. and Mrs. C. S. Henshaw, Leon Dammun, W. S. Shepard, J. W. Keene and Mr. Saunders, all of Boston.
